Don't stare continuously. Look at them while you're talking and while you're asking questions. Occasionally take your eyes off while you speak (but don't stare into empty space as if he wasn't there) Never look over your speaking partner's shoulder as if you were looking for someone more important to talk to.

REVIEW OF HOW TO TALK ANYONE ANYTIME ANYWHERE THE SECRETS OF GOOD COMMUNICATION LARRY KING

- This book spends far more time telling us what kind of materials are needed and where to buy them/how to use them, than it does

"how" to draw manga. I want to learn what characteristics make a successful manga figure, not how to produce a manga comic book. I did not feel this book was very useful - there is only one useful page, for example, discussing eyes, and it simply has 4 sets of "boys' eyes" and 4 of "girls' eyes." I don't consider this a "how to draw" book but rather a "how to get started making manga books with all the appropriate materials." Give me a black marker and some colored pencils and I'm happy. This book isn't worth it.

- Up until "Running Blind" I thought that Lee Childs' books were the best thing to happen in the genre since the death of Alistair Maclean. I read this one in a single day and was intrigued until the last 4 chapters. I kept hoping that Childs' untracable "murder weapon" would turn out to be something original and clever. Instead it is based on an old myth that holds no truth, so I will not give it away, but expect to be disappointed. I wish that Childs' had done a little more research since his whole premise is based on something that research has showed to be impossible. The writing and the characters are so clever and interesting that to be honest I feel cheated. I feel like I have read an Agatha Christie novel all the way through, only to be told at the end..."The butler did it."
