REVIEW OF ARIA POUR SAXOPHONE ALTO ET PIANO FOR ALTO SAXOPHONE AND PIANO

- Pity Mr. Diamond should have chosen precisely such an important matter to ride the wave of his Pulitzer for a hasty cash harvest. I can see why he did, it is such a popular subject nowadays that it just couldn't fail to yield bountifully but we, the people on this sorry spinning ball, deserved better. Yet another wasted chance to pass this important message through. Disappointment is generously served in various flavors in this book. You get a cold platter of the plain kind of the stuff from the patchy approach (yes, very common indeed in this field, but then, I was expecting more from such an acclaimed author) Then a basket of letdown with the shallow and wrong economic reasoning it uses, a cup full to the rim of frustration with the wrong historical data (Valencia in Spain a place of ancestral small sustainable communities of irrigating farmers????? yeah, right, it must be the golf course mowers... who pay for water a tenth of its transport cost, let alone market or environmental costs!), mousse of emptiness at the nonexistent but thoroughly anticipated chapter on welfare economics... and a bitter dessert made with this yet another failure to pass the important message it promised. Most certainly, the problem must have not been lack of importance of the matter. To promise enlightenment and not deliver is a hefty responsibility when one chooses to delve on such an important subject. Shame on Mr. Diamond for this. Maybe he was not read when small a tale about a boy who cried wolf. It wouldn't surprise me, considering the lack of literary education he shows...

- Jared Diamond is after big game in this book, namely an understanding of how societies choose their own future through their environmental stewardship of their resources. He studies past societies that failed and collapsed to see where they went wrong and takes a hard look at several societies that had severe environmental challenges that they succeeded in solving. He also takes a close look at modern environmental challenges in both the Third World and the First World to determine whether or not these challenges are solvable in a realistic time frame. Doctor Diamond believes that a major collapse is on the way for the entire world unless we get our environmental house in order. He gives a time frame of about fifty years to see the worst of it arrive, within the lifetimes of many children and young people alive today. He spends a chapter or two looking at signs of hope, like forestry initiatives and mining initiatives that are trying to promote sustainable resource management. He talks about the horrors of various Third World countries with their overpopulation problems that get solved through civil wars and genocides and warns that this sort of event will become wide-spread if we don't get our act together. The book is a depressing read, with its focus on failures and screw-ups, but it's an important book to read and understand in these times.
