REVIEW OF STANDARDS AND GUIDELINES FOR ELECTROPLATED PLASTICS

- The opening passage is a breathtaking description that works like a little google earth trip to land the reader in the ancient Mediterranean, where the story unfolds with ornate language and an everyman struggle about marriage for the sake of expedience, sake of the family or true love. Pamphilus, the main character, is torn in a realistic way and buffeted by tragedy he cannot express. He falls in love with a tragic and beautiful hetaira, a highly cultured courtesan who recites plays and poetry and encourages young men to examine how they live. This beauty of this kind of character must have been quite differently perceived by the ancient Greeks because the main problem with her according to Pamphilus' family is that she is not Greek. After her tragic death, the members of her household are sold into slavery but her younger sister is rescued by Pamphilus' very just and reasonable father after learning of his son's love for the girl (Pamphilus has impregnated her but will not be permitted to marry her). This is the portrait of a young man attempting to capture some answers about love and meaning. There seem to either be a scene or two missing or Wilder intentionally left critical events out of the narrative and there is a slightly awkward foreshadowing of Christianity. Pamphilus' out is presented as a very Christian type of acceptance of his situation informed by Christian love and this feels a bit forced. Other than these minor blemishes, this is a nice little novella even if it's not terribly filling.

- My brother lives in Bangkok and I've been there many times so I was keen to see what a novel set there would be like and I wasn't disappointed - Mr Moore evokes the seediness and poverty without it appearing soul-destroyingly hopeless because he manages to balance it with interesting characters (both the good, the bad and the humanly flawed), a good mystery and moments of beauty and humour. I enjoyed it and intend to try the next one...
