This thesis describes some of the processes and results obtained during the design and prototyping of a single seat experimental aircraft. The major aim was to maximise the Triaviation score of the aircraft. This score is a combination of the top speed, the stall speed and the rate of climb. The aircraft has been designed constructed, inspected and flown. The process of designing and prototyping is outlined in this thesis. Details are provided regarding preliminary design, numerical optimisation and the process of building the prototype. The aircraft registered VH-ZYY is a shoulder wing monoplane using a Continental IO-240 aircraft engine. The aircraft has a high power to weight ratio and light wing loading to assist it to climb well and fly slowly. Full span flaperons are used to increase the maximum coefficient of lift at the stall. The primary structure is aluminium with a carbon fibre and nomex cored cowl. All steel components have been formed with 4130 chrome molybdenum aircraft grade tubing. All hardware uses AN specification parts. VH-ZYY is registered in Australia as an Experimental aircraft.

REVIEW OF CONTINENTAL IO 240 ENGINE PARTS MANUAL MYSTIMORE

- This is a great book, but I wish the Winds of Light Series would be combined into a single novel and available.
- Knowing and working with many young children, I have come to appreciate that there are certain concepts that we, as adults, tend to take for granted as being somehow obvious or, if you will, self-evident. One of these is the inevitability of death. Trying to explain death to a child - particularly to a very young ( 2 - 4 year old) child can be an exasperating experience for even the most well meaning parent, teacher or concerned adult. Luckily, there is a growing body of literature, written to be looked at while being read to youngsters that simplify the essential concept sown to a level that can be understood by the child and will suffice until the child lets us know, through their ever more sophisticated questions, that they need more information. I have a collection of such books that I use and recommend to parents, where death has been a recent event in the family, for use with their children. This book by Bryan Mellonie and Robert Ingpen, is the one I most frequently recommend for use with this youngest group of children. Each page contains a minimum of words with an illustration on the facing page - of which there are only about 20. Immediately, by design, the most common adult well-intentioned error is defeated: that involving giving into the propensity to talk TOO MUCH; to use TOO MANY WORDS; to try to explain the idea in a way that the young child is no where near ready to grasp yet. The initial page and illustration present an exemplary example. On the right side is a simple, hand-drawn illustration of a bird's nest containing two eggs. On the facing (left side) page, the following is the entirety of the text: There is a beginning And there is an ending for everything That is alive. In between is living. The rest of the text and illustrations bring this same basic idea home to kids via references all manner of living things. Sea creatures, plants, people, birds, trees and insects among them. On the fourth page across from a drawing of a crab: Nothing that is alive Goes on living forever. How long it lives depends upon What it is and what happens While it is living. The next-to-last page: So, no matter how long they are, Or how short, lifetimes are really All the same. They have beginnings, and endings, And there is living in between. Young children cannot be expected to understand death as we adults do - or believe we do. The decomposition of bodies, the questions of life-after-death, issues involving illness and disease: all of these are beyond the scope of conceptual understanding of the average preschooler. Keep it simple until more complex questions are forthcoming from the child. This book is a good first step in what is apt to be a prolonged, increasingly complex process. If sadness should befall your family (or a pet, or a friend, etc.) and you have a pre-schooler, take a look at this book and ask yourself if it might not be a good place to begin explaining things to YOUR child. I would certainly use it for mine.
