REVIEW OF PHYSICAL SCIENCE PAPER 2 JUNE 2011

- One of the most direct, straightforward, research-based presentations of the shadow side of compulsory education, Harber, a professor of international education at the University of Birmingham, describes in global terms the ways in which schooling not only reproduces violence around the world, but actually naturalizes it and propels it. Because compulsory education is fundamentally authoritarian in nature, and the institution is arranged to control and survey those within it, formal education in many contexts (even dear old Britain) inculcates insensibility towards emotional and physical brutality, sexual abuse, racism and classism. Harber, a plain speaking, no nonsense academic with abundant experience in international education projects, offers a unique and compelling global perspective on the toxic effects of education on pupils. He takes on directly the ways in which almost all educational policy discourse begins with a false consensus--and perhaps a false consciousness--that universal formal education is always of positive humanist benefit in childrens' lives. Instead, after several chapters in which he traces the relationship between recent genocides in (the former) Yugoslavia or Rwanda to common school practices, or the incidence of corporal punishment in the classrooms of contemporary "developed" countries like the United States and Britian, Harber suggests pointedly, "It would be good if in the future politicians, academics and others concerned with educational policy always acknowledged in their speeches and their writing that schools do hard as well as good and that school-pupil violence exists." His book is chock ablock with evidence that this is so, as uncomfortable as this for many. In an American context, where very few academics write bluntly and unapologetically about the harmful effects of education on the human mind and spirit, Harber's work is refreshingly unadorned and unembellished.

- This was the first book I have ever read on Kerouac, I got so interested In is writing that Im now on a second. To me, Jack felt constrained by the frailty of the human body and its overall worthlessness in the whole scheme of things. This book tells his story about a chance meeting with a Zen buddhist called Japhy Ryder who Kerouac respected deeply, he talks of his travels on freight trains along the coast and trips hiking up mountains, in essence he thought too much and the more he thought the more constrained he felt.His best line in the book was "I spent a whole year being celibate in the belief that lust was the direct cause of birth which was the direct source of suffering and pain"Its a good book, hard to understand in parts if your not American but it was interesting and witty.
